Law360 (May 18, 2023, 3:56 PM EDT) -- Cullen and Dykman LLP announced that an experienced construction litigation attorney with more than 15 years of experience working with clients such as property owners, contractors and not-for-profit organizations joined the firm's New York office as a partner.

Cynthia P. Camacho joined Cullen & Dykman earlier this month after a 17-year stint with labor and construction boutique Malapero Prisco & Klauber LLP. She told Law360 Pulse in an emailed statement Thursday that the firm's reputation and the potential to grow her litigation practice were that main reasons behind her decision to join.

"I am delighted to be joining one of the premier construction litigation groups in NY and I look forward to working with such a talented group of people," Camacho said in a statement.

A graduate of Albany Law School of Union University, Camacho's practice focuses on representing a wide variety of clients on construction-related matters such as litigation, general liability, premises, labor law, and products liability. The firm added that she also has experience counseling clients regarding negligent supervision and lack of security claims.

"We are thrilled to have Cynthia join our team at Cullen and Dykman," managing partner Christopher H. Palmer said in a statement. "Her extensive experience in construction litigation and general liability, combined with her skill in advising clients on complex legal matters, makes her a valuable addition."

Along with Camacho, Cullen & Dykman announced that corporate partner Ilana T. Pearl also joined the firm's New York office this month. Additionally, the firm announced last October that it would relocate to a new office in Manhattan's Financial District. The location, which has over 120 employees, specializes in banking, corporate law work, and litigation.
